

CRISIS INTERVENTION SERVICES AND RESOURCES

As mental health professionals across the United States reflect on our relationship with policing and community violence, we recognize the importance of normalizing alternatives to contacting the police in non-life-threatening crisis situations, as an essential step towards creating a safer society for everyone. The recently publicized murder of Daniel Prude, 41, has drawn greater attention to the pervasive pattern of police violence inflicted upon Black people experiencing mental health crises. While anti-Black racism was undoubtedly a contributing factor in the wrongful death of Mr. Prude, statistics show that all individuals suffering from mental crises are at greater risk for fatal encounters with the police. As a part of our effort to promote the safety and wellbeing of our community and those we serve, BGSP's Anti-Racism Committee has compiled the following resources for both students and practicing clinicians to utilize in the case of a mental health emergency.

While crisis intervention services can function as an alternative to police involvement, there is no guarantee that the crisis team will refrain from contacting the police if deemed necessary. We recommend that whenever possible, the caller remain on the phone and/or at the scene until intervention services arrive. When appropriate, specify to the care team that the individual is unarmed, has no intent to harm others, and is requesting that there will be no police involvement.

A "crisis" situation is one that requires prompt attention, but is not immediately life threatening. That is, a crisis occurrence is one that can be improved or resolved by a visit from a mobile crisis team, who generally responds within 48 hours, or by telephone counseling and referral by NYC Well, the Health Department's 24 hour information and referral hotline operated by the Mental Health Association of New York City, Inc.

1-888-NYC-WELL (1-888-692-9355) is a free, confidential helpline for New York City residents. You can call 24 hours per day/7 days a week. The staff of trained mental health professionals help callers find mental health and substance abuse services. NYC Well is multilingual and multicultural:
